THE South-Carolina Gazette.

From MONDAY Auguſt 13th, to MONDAY Auguſt 20th, 1750.

From the UNIVERSAL MAGAZINE, for April, 1750.

HOLLAND.

PRIVATE letters from the Hague are far from applauding the new negotiations here; on the contrary, it is aſſerted that they have cauſed above 30,000 of the inhabitants, ſome of them no inconſiderable perſonages for wealth and property, to diſpoſe of their effects, and ſlip away, ſome to one country, ſome to another, but moſt of them to England. The city of Amſterdam is ſurrounded with troops; and theſe, inſtead of being removed at the inſtances of the burgomaſters and magiſtrates, are daily reinforced by ſmall detachments, ſome of whom are advanced before the very gates. And when any Diſturbances happen, daily Sacrifices are made of the Ringleaders of the Mutineers, as they are called, who are publickly executed by Way of Example. This is repreſented as the unhappy Situation of a Country once famous for Liberty; but now gradually ſinking into an abject State; at one Time in Danger of falling a Prey to foreign Enemies; at another of being deprived of its ancient Privileges, by the Artifices of its own ambitious Members.

Florence, April 18. All our Mountains are covered with Snow, and the uncommon Cold felt at this Seaſon, fills us with Fears for Harveſt. The Hoſpital of St. Maria Nova is ſo crouded with Poor and Sick, that they talk of removing a part of them to ſome Convents. Our Diſtreſs increaſes more and more; and the Cries of the Poor for Work and Bread fill our Ears Night and Day. The Courts of Spain and France ſeem to think ſeriouſly of getting a King of Lombardy crown'd, and will leave nothing unattempted to effect one this Summer.

Lyons, April 22. It is certain, they are fitting out ſeveral Ships at Toulon, which are to join a Squadron at Breſt, and afterwards proceed on a ſecret Expedition.

Paris, May 10. Several Conferences have been held lately at the Duke de Penthievre's, our High Admiral, ſince which Expreſſes have been ſent to ſeveral Ports, with Orders to fit out 18 Men of War, and Frigates, with all poſſible Expedition; but their Deſtination is not known.

Genoa, April 6. We have this Moment received Advice, that a Detachment of 100 Auſtrian Grenadiers accompanied by a Commiſſary, is arrived at Campo Freddo, and has not only ſeized on that Fief, but alſo taken Poſſeſſion of ſome other Villages dependant on the Republic; which Piece of News cannot fail of creating ſome uneaſineſs here.

AT laſt the long wiſhed for iſland appeared, but the ſcurvy was ſo inveterate, that, for ſome time after their landing, they bury'd 6 or 7 people every day, and it was but by almoſt imperceptible degrees that the leaſt affected grew better. The Centurion reached the iſland but two days before the Trial ſloop, which had ſuffer'd little leſs; 34 of her crew had periſhed, and the Captain, Lieutenant, and three men, were all who were able to work the ſhip. This ſpeedy meeting gave them great hopes that they ſhould ſhortly be joined by their companions; but it was the 21ſt of June before they perceiv'd another ſail, which ſoon after diſappeared, but on the 26th came again in ſight, and was known to be the Glouceſter. Mr. Anſon, ſenſible, by the damage of his own ſhip, of the diſtreſſed condition of the other, haſtened off to her a boat, laden with water, refreſhments, and, what was ſtill more neceſſary, a reinforcement of ſeamen. Never was relief more ſeaſonable, nor ever was there a more affecting ſight. Two thirds of the ſhip's company had died, and thoſe who ſtill remain'd alive, were, except the officers and their ſervants, reduced to the utmoſt extremity. A pint of water was now their daily allowance, and this was ſo near ſpent, that in a few days they muſt all have periſhed with thirſt. This had certainly been their fate, if the winds had continued contrary, which for a whole month drove them off from an iſland, to which they had approached very near. All their efforts to land had proved ineffectual, and their water and proviſions, with which they had been more than once ſupplied, being ſpent, they abandoned themſelves to deſpair, which was aggravated by the ſight of a place, in which they knew there was plenty of proviſions. But theſe terrible apprehenſions were diſſipated by the fortunate change of the wind, on the 28th of July, which carry'd them into the bay where the two other ſhips rode. The complement of the Glouceſter was reduced to 80 men; but, tho' they were all ſick, a much leſs number died, when aſhore, than thoſe of the Centurion; which muſt, doubtleſs, be attributed to the ſalutary effects of the commodore's refreſhments, which had prepared their bodies for a more ſpeedy recovery.

As to the victuallers, one of them had been diſcharged ſoon after their leaving Madera, the other did not arrive at Juan Fernandez till Auguſt. She was the more welcome, as ſhe had a ſupply of bread, and, like the reſt of the ſquadron, was given over as being either loſt or returned back. As ſhe was a more cumberſome ſhip, and had fewer hands on board, it was feared that ſhe would appear to have ſuffered ſtill more than the others; but, on the contrary, they perceived, with aſtoniſhment, that not ſo much as her rigging was damaged; for, indeed, ſhe was but juſt come from a harbour, which the crew fortunately diſcovered, when on the point of periſhing. On the 16th of May, as they were driving along the coaſt of the continent, in the Lat. of 45 30 South, they perceived a narrow inlet, thro' which they ſailed, and found themſelves in a ſafe and commodious harbour. Here the 16 men, who were all the crew, remained 2 months, ſolacing themſelves with the water, and other refreſhments, which the ſoil afforded. Their own apprehenſions were the only allay to their pleaſure; they durſt not venture far into the country for fear of the Spaniards, whom they imagined to be nearer than they really were; and alſo of the natives, whom they fancied to be a cruel and gigantic race. Theſe fears were, however, groundleſs; for, during their whole ſtay, they ſaw only one Indian family, conſiſting of a man, his wife, and children, who came thither in a canow. To prevent being betrayed by them, they prudently brought them on board, and endeavoured, by the kindeſt uſage, to reconcile them to their confinement. The man appeared to be a perſon of uncommon ſagacity, of which he gave a notable proof, in the recovery of his liberty. One ſtormy night, he took the opportunity of a ſcuttle's being left open, and carried off all his family in one of the ſhip's boats; at the ſame time, turning all the others adrift, that they might not purſue him. The noiſe of his oars gave them the firſt notice of his eſcape, but he was then out of their reach. Tho' his flight renewed their fears, they were ſo touched with the merit of a man, who had riſked every thing to regain his liberty, that, leſt he ſhould periſh, in the woods, for want of food, they carried thither ſome proviſions, and afterwards diſcovered, with inexpreſſible pleaſure, that he had found and made uſe of them. Soon after the ſhip put again to ſea, and, in a ſhort time, joined the Centurion.

The Wager man of war, of the ſame ſquadron, was not ſo fortunate. As the neceſſary ſtores and implements for beſieging Baldivia, were on board this ſhip, the captain was very deſirous to rendezvouz at the iſland of Socora; but the violence of the wind, the rocks on the coaſt, the ill behaviour of his crew, and the bad condition of the ſhip occaſioned its wreck. The 150 men, who were were on board, got safe on shore, but immediately divided into parties, and quarrelled among themselves. Could they have imagined they were so near the victualler as, indeed, they were, it might have brought them to a better temper. This vessel was not above 30 leagues from them, and might have carried them all to the island of Juan Fernandez, whither the Captain insisted upon going; and represented to his men that it would be no difficult matter to seize some Spanish vessels near the island of Chiloe, and that, all things duly weighed, there was less hazard in proceeding, than in going back. But his imperious manner, and an act of extreme violence, which he committed, caused the majority of his crew to mutiny, who, having confined him, left him, with 16 of his partizans, on that barren and desolate island; and stowing themselves close in the long boat, they sailed through the streights of Magellan. Their want of provisions could not be relieved, the coast being either barren, or inaccessible; so that half their number had perished when they reached Brasil. The small company which adhered to their Captain, were still more unfortunate; for after many vain efforts to make their way Northwards in the boats which were left them, being reduced from 16 to 3, by a series of hardships, they were obliged to surrender themselves to the Spaniards at Chiloe. There the capt. and his 3 fellow-sufferers were entertained with great humanity, carried over to Chili, and, at length, according to the cartel, sent back to England.

Thus, of the whole squadron, only two men of war, the sloop, and the victualler, joined each other. The latter being now unserviceable, as all the provisions had been taken out of her, and too much damaged to venture on a return to Europe, was, soon after her arrival, destroy'd, and the men put on board the other ships; and, indeed, a supply of hands was what they wanted most. Of 961 men, which those four ships had on board, 626 had dy'd, and the survivors were so debilitated and depressed, that their hopes of executing their designs gave way to apprehensions of an attack from the enemy. Some broken pitchers, with heaps of cinders, and the bones of fishes lately eaten, which they found upon the shore, made them conclude that the Spanish squadron had out-sailed them, and was in quest of them. [To be continued.]
